Barbers, Astrologers And Quacks Treated Patients Until 16th Century

BY CHEREE BRIGGS
UNC-CH News Bureau

In Babylonian days, the surgeon whose patient died had to give up his two most valuable instruments.

Under the Code of Hammarabi, the physician's hands were cut off if a patient died "under the bronze knife." So, no doctor would go near a dying patient.

For thousands of years after that, physicians were bound by rigid medical philosophies enforced by church-run universities. Dissent was unheard of, and human dissections were done only by the daring, such as the artist, Leonardo da Vinci. Astrologers had more influence with patients than physicians, for it was the astrologer who decided the best time for bleedings and leechings.

And prescriptions were compounded from at least one part of belief in magic. "For example, the best treatment for rabies was thought to be a pill made from the scalp of a person who had been hanged," says Dr. Nathan Womack.

Dr. Womack, chairman emeritus of the Department of Surgery at the UNC School of Medicine at Chapel Hill, spoke recently about the great strides made in medicine and surgery in the 16th century—a period when much of these practices began to change.

At the beginning of the century, the least educated of three "grades" of physicians treated most patients. The university-trained physicians treated only "exceptional wounds" or wounds of persons the king considered important. "The most highly educated men debated the finest points of early medical writers and philosophers. Medicine was integrated with philosophy, and practical application abhorred. A discipline requiring the use of the hands did not belong in a university, they thought," Dr. Womack explained. For this reason, surgery was not taught in the university until the introduction of the study of human anatomy of dissection.

The academicians, then, did the least work, but had the most prestige.

A second "grade" of doctor also was known. These were men who had been educated but could not get an appointment at a university. Instead, they attached themselves to a nobleman's court. "They occasionally cared for people in the community, but not often. Pomposity was a necessity, particularly if one was to hold his position as court physician," he said.

And so, it fell to the men who had no education, ones who knew no Latin, to treat the masses. Since there were few medical texts written in the vernacular, these third "grade" physicians relied upon their own cleverness, experience and hearsay. When in doubt, there was always an astrologer, witch or sorcerer nearby.

"These men were often quacks and charlatans who did not stay in one place long enough for their misdeeds to become common knowledge.

"At the same time, and in her surgeons. Several centuthe same grade, were the barbies before, a Papal decree had forbid the wearing of beards by monks and priests. The barber's job was given to a lay person at the monastery whose other task was 'bleeding' the monks. In many monasteries, it was custom to bleed monks at regular intervals. It was only natural for this same person to perform both functions. It was in this way that the barber was wed to the surgeon. Eventually, many of these men came to be better trained and more responsible than the charlatans," said Dr. Womack.

"Medicine was starting to work its way out of an intellectual jungle during this time," he noted, adding that the changes were brought about by a few men, working independently of one another.

Dr. Womack considered briefly the contributions of six men: Paracelsus and Fernel in medicine, Leonardo da Vinci and Vesalius in anatomy and Brunschwig and Pare in surgery.

"One of the most interesting of these was the barber surgeon, Pare. He was not well educated and he tells us that he could not read Latin. Yet his writings (some of which Dr. Womack and Robert White Linker have translated from French to English) reveal a versatile physician, one whose concern was for all classes of persons."

Pare began his career in the Parisian charity hospital, the Hotel Dieu. Three years later, he went to war attached to the Colonel-General. As a result of the gunshot wounds he treated in battle, Pare discovered men died not from the "poisons" in the gunpowder — but from the wound itself.

He also found by accident a new way to treat wounds. The custom had been to fill the wound with hot oil or burn it with an instrument like a soldering iron, Dr. Womack said.

One day Pare found himself without any "oyle" and improvised. He mixed egg yolk, oil of roses and turpentine and applied it to the wounds. He spent a restless night, fearing he would find those patinets in great pain or near death in the morning. To his surprise, those treated with the ointment were resting comfortably. The others treated with oil, were feverish, showed signs of being in great pain, and he noted many wounds had become inflamed.

As physician to the common man as well as the king, Pare dedicated considerable time to artificial limbs. In the translation by Womack and White, drawings illustrate Pare's concern for the patient's whole body rather than one limb. He cautioned physicians to consider the patient's life and offered sketches of a wooden leg for poor persons as well as a highly sophisticated design of metal for richer patients.

Dr. Womack concluded: "This delightful man wrote in French vernacular so all could read. He introduced a new era, not only in the treatment of gunshot wounds, but in fractures and compound fractures, the reintroduction of the ligature (tying off veins and arteries to prevent bleeding in amputations), the introduction of the tourniquet, artificial limbs and many other things.

"With Pare, surgery attained a dignity that, despite some, it has never lost."

CHRIST IS THE ANSWER
"Thanks be unto God for His unspeakable gift." 2 Cor. 9-15.
The giver God, the Gift is the redeemer, yea He is the Life as well as the Light of the World. Without whose death we must have perished; His greatness, unspeakable. Amazing; surpassingly lovely: for such vile objects as us; He is the pearl of great price, the morning star, the sun of righteousness, the bread of life. He is the great center of the universe; the fountain of all existence; the source of all blessedness; the Holy Spirit would have us take His example and His word to heart. Christ is the evidence of the love of God to us. No other proof could have exhibited it so clearly and fully. Dear reader, are you in possession of the highest gift heaven has to offer, if not would you receive Him now.
Are you in the inner circle?
Have you heard the Master's call?
Have you given your heart to Jesus?
Is He now your all in all?
REV. CHARLES S. HARTNESS
Pastor of Friendship Baptist Church
On Old Cornelius Road.

So that's just what we're doing.
Fill in the coupon and send in your slogan or slogans. We'll look over all the entries and pick the one we think is best. And we'll give the winner a week vacation, anywhere or everywhere in the state, all expenses paid, for the whole family.
The deadline for entries is August 31, 1973. The contest is open only to residents of North Carolina.
It's really an easy contest. After all, you're working with one of the most beautiful states in America.
Yours.

From the Highlands to the magnificent Carolina Coast, and everywhere in-between, stretches a land of incredible beauty. This is your State . . . stately pines, waterfalls plunging down high rocks and green hillsides, undiscovered mountain trails, wilderness and wild-game, lonely, lovely stretches of beach, golf, fishing, everything for the experience of a lifetime. Our State . . . it's great. See it all this summer.
