BY CHRIS COLBY

CLOSEUPS: Never count Joan Rivers out. The brash, crass performer has landed in the "center square" of Hollywood Squares, which is launching its new syndicated series September 14th. According to the producers, "Rivers is perfect for the job. The center square requires a personality who spontaneously interacts with the other celebrities." We'll see... Cable News Network has been trying to round up all of Elvira Presley's former leading ladies to appear on a special weekend program commemorating the 10th anniversary of Elvira's death. Amanda Blake (Miss Kitty of Gunsmoke) is the second woman ever to be honored with a star on the Western Walk of Fame in Newhall, California. She joins such luminaries as John Wayne, Tex Ritter, Roy Rogers, Clint Eastwood, etc. The only other female so honored is Dale Evans. Jackie Cooper, who just finished directing an episode of "The Law and Harry McGraw," CBS' new fall series, says, "Some people call it Hollywood's merry-go-round ride. If that's true, I sure caught the brass ring." Jackie has been working consistently since he was a child star. Kenny Rogers is equally good behind a camera. His book of portraits "Your Friends and Mine," containing fantastic photos of Elizabeth Taylor, Linda Gray, Lisa Mielicki, Michael Jackson, Lily Tomlin, Kirk Douglas, and so on, hits the bookstore in October. Rebecca Arthur (no relation to Basil, who plays the object of Bronson Pinchot's affection on "Perfect Strangers," worked for 19 years as a training person investigator for a New York detective agency before he became an actress. FOCUS: I'm told that "L.A. Law's" Susan Day is planning to become Mrs. Bernard Sofronski. He's a TV producer... Both of Dixie Carter's daughters want to become actresses. Gina will study drama at Harvard this fall season, and Mary-Dixie, still a high school student, is attending Yale's Summer Theater Workshop... Look for Gene Barry to return in an updated two-hour version of "Burke's Law." Whaat? No Bat Masterson? ... Gerald McWay's vacation hideaway is 10,000 feet above the town of Telluride, Colorado. Says the "Simon and Simon" star, "It forces me to relax. At that altitude, you just holding a script is tiring."

Imagination Runs WILD In Science

A new science-teachings method in North Carolina's public schools may have students turning into grasshoppers, shrews and hawks when they return to school this fall. Under a correlation plan between the N.C. Wildlife Resources Commission and the state Department of Public Instruction, students may get a better understanding of the reasons for protecting the state's natural resources. Some of the wildlife activities in the new plan call for students to pretend they are different animals—some predators and some prey—to get an understanding of natural processes.

This summer, 15 public school teachers matched the Commission's two Project WILD teaching manuals with "guidelines set by the State Board of Education for science and social studies. Project WILD is a method endorsed and sponsored by wildlife and natural resources agencies nationwide to help school teachers with their lessons on the environment. North Carolina began using Project WILD in 1984.

In one lesson for sixth-graders, the teacher's goal, according to the state Department of Public Instruction, is that children learn the importance of natural resources. One Project WILD activity for that lesson calls for the teacher to divide the students into groups to grasshoppers, shrews and hawks and give them colored pipe cleaners to represent food from the grasshoppers. Some of the pipe cleaners represent pollution. Since the shrew preys on the grasshopper and the hawk preys on the shrew, the activity shows how the new insects more pollution when it eats the grasshopper. And, it shows how the pollution contamination multiplies when the hawk eats the shrew.

This lesson demonstrates the principle of biological concentration of contaminants in the food chain in terms and students can easily understand.

A $2,500 grant from the N.C. Wildlife Federation paid the teachers to match activities described in Project WILD with their own teaching guidelines. Teachers divided into teams according to grade levels and subjects such as science and social studies to devise the new teaching method. A 15-page manual compiled by those teams will be delivered to 1,000 of the state's teachers who have attended Project WILD workshops in the past.

"These teachers are familiar with Project WILD, but this correlation will give them an easy way to use Project WILD to meet their teaching goals," he said.
