SOIL AND WATER CONSERVATION

By W. M. BLAND
Work Unit Conservationist

Single County District Iredell has recently progressed to become a single county conservation district. It will be known as the Iredell Soil and Water Conservation District. Its main purpose is to promote the conservation of all natural resources through all the agencies and organizations in the county. The Extension Service is responsible for educating the public of the needs for conservation. This must be done first. The Soil Conservation Service is responsible for assisting landowners develop plans for conserving and improving their natural resources. Then with assistance from the Forest Service, the Wildlife Resources Commission, and the Soil Conservation Service the landowner is able to apply his conservation plan to his land.

The soil and water conservation district is similar to the hub of a wheel with all agencies and organizations being similar to spokes in that wheel.

Iredell Soil and Water Conservation District is governed by a five-man committee called District Supervisors. They are Harper A. VanHoy, Chairman, John T. Patterson, Vice-Chairman, J. L. Rice, Secretary-Treasurer, J. C. Mudd, Sr., and W. M. Pressley, members.

What Food Surplus?
By the year 2000 the population of our country is supposed to double. If there is to be even a modest improvement in total world food output by then, production will need to be three times as great as it is today. High production to-

BOYS WILL BE BOYS

...While Girls-They Want Marriage

Scientists have taken a long look at dating and confirmed what parents have suspected for generations — boys will be boys and girls want to get married.

Today's teenagers may look and talk more grown-up than their folks did at their age, but their behavior with the opposite sex is still subject to the old battle between biology and matrimony.

If anything, modern youngsters are more aware of their problems, and more deeply troubled by them, than their parents were.

These findings were drawn from interviews with more than 1,000 college students by a team of scientists, led by Dr. William E. Starbuck, in his book, Pre-marital Dating Behavior, based on the survey, has been called "The Kinsey report of the younger set."

It is available in a soft cover edition published by Bantam Books.

"What does the teenage couple do on a date?"

"That depends on whether they are just dating or going steady. The boy generally determines how far he can go with his date. The girl on the other hand often takes the lead with her 'steady.' Boys say they are happier when playing it safe while girls prefer to concentrate their affection on one beau at a time. Her problem, as always, is how to keep respectable while prospecting for a husband. His — his father and grandfather might recall — is how to have fun before being led to the altar.

Judging by the sample group, both the girls and the boys are achieving their respective goals.

Four out of ten college boys have intimate relations with the opposite sex and two out of three have done so at one time or another before marriage. Yet six out of seven coeds remain virgins until marriage. Most of the girls have never gone beyond kissing and hugging.

The figures don't lie and the boys aren't boasting. According to the experts, few boys seek sex companions on the campus. Most of their "heavy" dating occurs on weekends and holidays at home or elsewhere away from school. Their dates are likely to be girls their parents don't know, from different social, economic and educational backgrounds. These are not the girls the college boys marry.

Actually, say the scientists, "heavy petting" can mean intimate relations, particularly when the couple is in this, whether the couple go to marriage or not. But the great deterrent to "going too far" is the young people themselves. The boy generally determines how far he can go with his date. Parents, for all their difficulty of communication with adolescent sons, does not in itself lead the children still exert a major influence on premarital behavior. It's the exception when a mother fails to have "heart-to-heart talks" with

Public Library Notes

Young Miss Hubbard by Jeanne Bowman. Molly Hubbard is a successful advertising copywriter, and hopes to marry a young ad salesman — but first must straighten out the troubles of her young, pretty, and flighty, widowed sister-in-law.

Look Back, My Love by Jean Carey. A girl with a yen for the past, Nikky Blair welcomes the chance to work for a foundation which plans to establish an 18th Century Colony in the Berkshires, and to cooperate with a young man who apparently shares her ideals.

The Port by Henry Beetle Hough. The ever-recurring struggle between the old order and the new is here focused, in peculiarly New England fashion, upon the opposition between the native and the summer visitors. Picking and Hodges, fresh from Madison Avenue, have plans for a yacht basin and a big development at Braddon Port. Between them and success stands the brutal murder of the wayward wife of a Nobel Prize physicist, and on the efforts of a police psychiatrist to demonstrate that Sinclair is mentally ill and innocent of the crime. Sinclair's unpleasant sexual history is against him, however, and he is convicted and electrocuted before the police learn they had the wrong man.

Death On Jerusalem Road by Douglas Angus. A young graduate student falls in love with a high school senior, and is involved in the police investigation of the murder of another high school girl in a Massachusetts resort town.

The Confessor by Jackson Donahue. Already headed for film production — for which it seems almost ready-made — this dramatic and somewhat sensational novel centers on young, handsome, intelligent Houston Cadillac salesman Brian Martin Sinclair who confesses to the brutal murder of the wayward wife of a Nobel Prize physicist, and on the efforts of a police psychiatrist to demonstrate that Sinclair is mentally ill and innocent of the crime. Sinclair's unpleasant sexual history is against him, however, and he is convicted and electrocuted before the police learn they had the wrong man.
